Rebounding for Christ: The story of one of Oklahoma's first All-State Basketball Stars Dr. Phillip J Finley
Travis Finley is one of many strong African-American men who found an outlet to help him persevere through a tumultuous period of societal unrest and uncertainties. Today, it is not uncommon for thousands of young black men and women to pursue scholarships through sports as a way to obtain a higher education; during the 1950's and 1960's, it was hope, skill, perseverance, and love of the game which propelled many black men to the spotlight. As told in this story, even that wasn't a guarantee for a successful career in athletics. My father worked hard at becoming an athlete and well respected gentleman in the community. I would like to say that I am one of four sons who decided to take a stab at looking into the eyes of a child, athlete, son, father, husband, grandfather, city councilman, and preacher. This is my story of my father out of the love and support of my family, friends, and those close to my father. Most gladly therefore will I rather glory in my infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses for Christ's sake: for when I am weak, then am I strong. 2 Corinthians 12th Chapter 9-10
